eLearning

Online learning turns a boon for your training budget

Training the different generations of employees in the workplace requires different methods that won't throw your budget in the red. A recent LinkedIn report on workplace learning, instructor-led classes are still the most common delivery format in many organizations. This is particularly true when it comes to diversity training, as it is generally felt that conversations on bias, discrimination or inclusion are better in person. However, here are some proven reasons why should you consider adding eLearning to your diversity and inclusion training toolkit.

Success stories

Success Stories - Stantec

This month we feature Stantec, which is making significant strides to provide a workplace that supports the inclusion and advancement of women to help them reach their true potential.

"We're offering a pathway to professional development through sessions that focus on empowering women to reach for leadership positions and share topics related to being effective in the workplace," says Asifa Samji, chair of the WLD sub-committee and vice president of environmental services. Examples of other initiatives – including Stantec's experience - are featured in our success stories here.
