Investigating the white, male culture of private practice law

"If you are a well-connected, affluent, good-looking, white, Anglo-Saxon male, you have a certain amount of credibility that is given to you without question. If you don't fit that...you've got to prove your credibility in a way that the hypothetical ideal does not."

A racialized woman lawyer gave us this response during my interview with her about what prevents diversity in private practice law. Her statement corroborates the results CCDI consistently sees in our ongoing Diversity by the Numbers: The Legal Profession project.

Smith School of Business launches LGBTQ+ professional leadership program

The first of its kind in Canada, Smith School of Business at Queen's University is launching a week-long professional leadership program designed specifically for senior business professionals who identify as LGBTQ+. Offered by Smith's Centre for Social Impact, the program is intended to help individuals strengthen their leadership impact and work with confidence and authenticity. It will combine teaching, discussion, team-based exercises and personal assessments. The program runs June 18-22.

"There was a time when many LGBTQ+ business people would shield their identities in the workplace," said Tina Dacin, Stephen J. R. Smith Chair of Strategy & Organizational Behavior, and Director of the Centre for Social Impact at Smith Business School. "Now there's the opportunity to embrace and apply your full identity at work." For more information and to apply please go to www.ssb.ca/diversity
